Setting

The opening to the book is set in an unknown part of the world on a cliff top by the sea. This could possibly be England as this is where Ted Hughes came from. As the Iron Man makes his way inland, he travels over hills and fields but ends up trapped in a giant hole. After he climbs out, he is kept in a different rural town nearby where there is a scrapyard. When the Space-Bat-Angel Dragon appears from space, it lands on Australia, causing tremors all around the world.

Context - Ted Hughes invented The Iron Man as a story for his own small children, and wrote it out just as he had told it over three or four nights. He described the story as "like a kit or blueprint for putting together a little boy", and he said that he felt he should tell his children stories to make things possible for them; stories that allowed them to win. He described The Iron Man as bringing the boy into a friendly relationship with the mysterious world of technology and machines in such a way that he can control it.
